iPhone's encryption is so good, not even cops can get past it

Law enforcement has a love-hate relationship with the iPhone. Features like Activation Lock have helped crack down on smartphone thefts, but there's always the lurking threat of someone asking Siri about 9/11 and accidentally dialling 911 in the process. The latest issue police are butting heads with Apple about relates to the company's late-2014 decision to no longer maintain decryption keys which let Apple unlock iOS 8 devices for police as part of active investigations. And New York's cops aren't happy about it! In a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, the FBI, Justice Department and Manhattan DA's office all asked Congress to force Apple (and other companies which offer a similar block on user data) to add backdoors designed specifically for law enforcement. Although he wasn't able to provide one example of an investigation that Apple's decision has blocked from moving forward, New York district attorney Cyrus Vance said that Manhattan DA's office has encountered 74 iPhones which were locked out to law enforcement investigations. Vance did give an example of previous shooting that would be impossible to solve today — whereby a shooting victim recorded footage of his assailant using an iPhone running iOS 6. Following the victim's death, the murderer was convicted due to the fact that police could retrieve the video.
